AGENTS OF KNOWLEDGE TRANSFER BETWEEN PROFESSIONAL ADMINISTRATIVE SERVICES, RESEARCH AND HE LEADERSHIP

Summary

Higher education institutions (HEIs) are 'expert organisations' that produce knowledge each and every day, with research from different disciplines clearly being a major source of such knowledge generation. We may think less immediately, however, about the various and considerable areas of expertise that are located in professional HE administrative services. As HEIs respond to increasingly challenging needs (e.g. globalization; internationalization etc.), HE development can benefit from the expertise contained in all areas of the institution, however, this may hard to locate or identify. If we consider the possible mutual benefits of internal knowledge transfer, how can an HEI's own research support administrations develop in an agile or more sustainable manner? How might administrative expertise be tapped on to better support processes within faculties to enable these to implement agile or more sustainable ways of working?

Our international conference investigates the complementary knowledge exchange between research, professional administrative services and HE leadership. Results from the ongoing AGICA project (www.agica.de) will be presented and discussed. Perspectives from administrators, researchers and institutional leaders will be included, drawing on international comparisons.
